

Peter N. Barnes-Brown

In Memoriam

With a shared vision that a differently structured law firm committed to excellence and client service could provide a unique value proposition, Peter and Chip Morse co-founded the firm in 1993.

Peter focused on emerging technology companies, life science companies, and companies from other countries starting business in the US. He advised clients in industries including biotech, elearning and educational IT, healthcare IT, medical devices, cloud, software, venture capital, consulting, education, and nonprofit and family business, and counseled clients on corporate, finance, securities, technology, M&A, and international law. He advised businesses through all stages of development – from startup through seed and angel rounds and venture capital financings; during operation as mature businesses, including acquisitions, joint ventures and strategic alliances; and to liquidity through sale and IPO. Having worked in-house as international counsel for an NYSE-listed company, he understood how critical it is for a legal advisor to cost-effectively help businesses bring revenue to the bottom line without unacceptable risk.

Peter's work with emerging technology companies and with healthcare IT, medical device, and biotech companies in angel and venture capital financings and mergers and acquisitions encompassed advising founders, CEOs and investors on the full range of business-legal issues encountered by such companies – choice of business entity, capital structure, corporate governance, equity and executive compensation, distribution and license agreements, joint ventures, strategic alliances, and intellectual property protection. He also guided companies in expanding their presence in international markets, including advice regarding foreign sales and distribution of products, overseas manufacturing and sourcing, strategic alliances and joint ventures, and acquiring and selling businesses.

Peter worked with companies from, or with significant operations in, more than 40 countries.
